Rules governing the use of this blog

This blog is subject to the general Terms and Conditions of the OECD website.

Your contribution is valuable, as is those of others. Following a few simple rules will ensure that this collaborative platform fosters open and constructive dialogue. When contributing to this website, please contribute in a civil and constructive way: abusive language or the transmission of obscene, offensive or illegal content is not accepted.

Avoid spamming or posting material that is not related to the discussion topics.

Refrain from advertising or posting commercial material.

Do not post contributions under another person's name.

Do not use multiple logins.

Note that the views expressed here can be personal views. Comments will not be construed as official positions of your employer unless stated explicitly.

Only submit materials for which you hold a copyright.

Act in good faith and assume others are doing so too. Please refrain from behavior which would lead disagreements to escalate into open conflict.

When using this blog please keep in mind that the OECD Secretariat:

1. Reserves the right to delete or to edit any contribution, and to take action against an account that violates these rules.
2. Does not guarantee the validity of the information contributed by non-OECD sources.
3. Will not respond systematically to each contribution.
4. Will monitor the website's content during OECD working hours (Paris time).
